Both until June 21

Being awarded a Colleen Print Trust Printmaking Fellowship at the Australian Print Workshop must be like being invited to appear on Dancing with the Stars; you get to work with a professional, but you have to be willing to learn on your feet.

With this show of six large, monochrome, single-plate etchings (or intaglio), Andrew Browne, a painter and photographer active since the early 1980s, shows some fancy footwork; thanks to Simon White, who printed five works, and Martin King, who collaborated on all, and printed A Hollow.

Before entering the APW workshop, Browne created detailed charcoal drawings that fully visualised his proposed etchings. He favours a mix of abstract shapes and naturalistic forms gleaned from habitual photography of wherever he happens to be. This series includes New York graffiti and detritus along Merri Creek.

Adding to the complexity of his coded mark-making is Browne’s delight in making his darks and lights ambiguous so that it may be unclear whether we’re looking at detail of a dazzlingly lit scene or enjoying the reverse effect familiar from a black-and-white photographic negative.

A symbolist, Browne can tease out the anthropomorphic character of natural forms, such as the limbs of a tree, by the merest adjustment in drawing. See the superb Fictions #2. Perhaps Browne’s major achievement with this folk is his innovative use of air-brush to apply liquid resist on plates for processes including lift-ground, aquatint and spit-bite etching. The softness to the edges of the tangle of branches of A Hollow was achieved this way.

Brownyne Rees is also showing etchings (from May 20), but printed from more than one plate, and with multiple colours applied intuitively. See Old Marriage with a block of blue straddling two blocks of ochre; and Nanango, with lovely blobby black verticals uniting a design of gestural and linear drawing in ochre on a Prussian blue ground.

Trained in the early 1980s as an illustrator, Rees worked in prints for 30 years in Queensland before spending a couple of years at Glasgow Print Studio, and then moving to Melbourne. She’s been involved with Firestation Print Studio since 2004, and has a studio there. The space feels domestic, but perhaps I think that because of Rees’ attitude to her work, which feels lived in, intimate. Printmaking is second nature to her; her affinity with it being shown by a willingness to improvise.

Rees may use acrylic sheets to print from rather than copper plate and the results are particularly inventive and unhindered. Of course, the acrylic is not subjected to corrosion by acid as copper is, but worked in drypoint.

She scores the acrylic with conventional tools including a power drill. She may create textures by applying carborundum to the surface, or even, by a handful of dirt from the car park.

The works in this show, which, for the artist, is a mid-life reflection on a long and successful life partnership, are more likely to be perceived by the viewer as textured notations from nature.

They might have resolved into landscapes if the artist had wanted to take a long view of the scrub. Instead, they offer a headlong immersion in the scene.

They are overlaid with line drawings of fish, grases and trees, and with vertical blocks of colour that work as directional markers read against masked shapes sometimes suggestive of a horizon line, they are congested, gestural, lively, and lyrical. Per an earlier series, but showing the same irreverent, exuberant attitude. Rees printed from a pair of lazy, French knickers. See what I mean about intimacy with her medium?

Jukebox tale bursts with ’60s hits

Aunt Mary (also known as Aunty Mary) is the perfect embodiment of the Australian spirit. As a young woman in the 1960s, she would have been a regular customer of the local jukebox, which was a symbol of freedom and rebellion.

The jukebox was a key part of the social landscape during that time, with its powerful yet simple tunes filling the air. Aunt Mary would have been inspired by the music, and it would have helped to shape her personality.

The installation at the exhibition space is based on a jukebox from the period. The machine is filled with 1960s hits, and visitors are invited to play a song and dance along with Aunt Mary.

The exhibit is a celebration of the music of the ’60s and the spirit of rebellion that it embodied. It’s a reminder of how music can bring people together and create a sense of community.
